Dear Dr Buch

Thank you again for your time this afternoon. I appreciate your willingness to raise your concerns in your email and during our discussion, the information you provided me about the context here in Brisbane and beyond, and connecting me to your extensive and multifaceted body of work.

Again, I apologise for the inconvenience that was caused to you and your colleagues associated with the assignment that was set by our faculty member. As I said, I am quite sure that Dr Barnes did not intend any professional disrespect. However, I certainly understand the implications of the situation and I am sorry for that.

As discussed, I will speak with the Heads of schools in Education, and other relevant areas in my Faculty, about working with their staff to identify opportunities to engage in curriculum design consultation, and providing students with education about the many contexts in which historians work (e.g., professional and academic) and appropriate ways to interact with and acknowledge the ideas and work of professionals (and, of course, all sources and experts).

Thanks, also, for providing me links to a the range of resources which will help facilitate this way forward. And, thank you for passing on the message that you sent to your colleagues after our conversation.

Best regards,

Lori
